The Byzantine Empire in the World of the Seventh Century

BYZANTIUM IN THE SEVENTH CENTURY 5 The migration of the Croats and Serbs represents the second great wave of Slavic colonization in the Balkans, brought about by the decline in the power of the Avars after their disastrous defeat near Constantinople in 626 Whereas the first wave of Slavic colonization had moved forward in alliance with the

Byzantium: a Very, Very Short Introduction

To make the history of Byzantium more manageable, Byzantinists tend to break it down into three stages. The time from the third century down to the sixth or seventh or even eighth centuries is known variously, depending on the perspective of the particular scholar, as the Late Antique or Late Roman (these terms suggest such, the history of Islam is related to, and has significance for, the way Byzantium progressed (or declined). The following image is a visual depiction of the expansion of Islam during the seventh and eighth century. This map also shows where Arabia was geographically in relation to Byzantium.

Late antiquity and Byzantium: an identity problem otherwise of Byzantium.⁴ Given these developments it is not surprising that several Byzantinists currently argue that Byzantium 'began' only in the seventh century or thereabouts. This view is strengthened by the turn in the scholarship away from political and narrative history based primarily on textual evidence in favour of material
